

History of the Committee on Energy and Commerce

History of the Committee on Energy and Commerce

On December 14, 1795, in the 4th Congress, the House of Representatives created a new standing committee, the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to "take into consideration all such petitions and matters of things touching the commerce and manufactures of the United States." This Committee was comprised of only seven members, all of whom held significant interest in the shipping and manufacturing industries. In 1819, because there was a desire to focus the Committee's energies on the increasing scope and complexity of American commercial activity, the Committee was split into two separate Committees -- the Committee on Commerce and the Committee on Manufacturers. In 1891, the name of the Committee was changed to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The Committee retained this title until year 1981, when the Committee's name was changed to its present name -- the Committee on Energy and Commerce -- to emphasize its lead role in guiding the energy policy of the United States. Today the Committee on Energy and Commerce is one of the oldest and largest standing Committee's in the House of Representatives and has 57 members.

During the first few sessions of the United States Congress, the House of Representatives developed a few methods to address petitions and claims: through creating a select committee to address the specific claim, cooperating with the Department of Treasury to work out a solution, by creating a select committee, or considering the petition or claim in the (Committee of the) Whole House. As more and more claims and petitions were submitted to Congress, it became apparent that Congress needed to find new ways to address the increased workload. The legislative branch, in an effort to increase efficiency and exert independence from the executive branch, established several standing or permanent Committees to address the claims that came before the House of Representatives.

International trade issues dominated the agenda, but dealing with domestic claims was also an essential function of the Committee. Domestic legislation dealt mostly with the establishment of ports of entry, the placement of piers, buoys, and lighthouses and the creation of a system for import duty collection. A large number of claims also addressed military back pay and pensions from the Revolutionary War. Just as they do today, Members of Congress considered the merits of all claims and drafted reports and bills based on those claims and forwarded the information to the House. During the Fourth Congress, the Committee forwarded 111 bills.

Just as the organization of Congress has shifted again and again, the Committee on Energy and Commerce has seen many changes in its 218 years. When the Fourth Congress created the Committee, it was one of only four standing Committees along with the Committee on Elections, the Committee on Revisal and Unfinished Business, and the Committee on Claims. As other committees were created in subsequent Congresses, the Committee lost some of its original jurisdiction. During the sixteenth Congress (1819-1821) the Committee relinquished jurisdiction over manufacturing issues with the creation of the Committee on Manufactures. The Committee on Commerce, as it was renamed, maintained a focus on regulation of trade and commerce.

Interstate

commerce increased dramatically during the 1860s as a result of a newly completed cross-country railroad network.

In 1887 the Interstate Commerce Commission was created to oversee the railroad industry. The agency fell under the Committee's jurisdiction and set a precedent for government regulatory function. During the 74th Congress the Committee expanded its jurisdiction to include radio-related matters but also gave away its jurisdiction over water transportation, the Coast Guard, lighthouses, and the Panama Canal.

Legislative Reorganization Act formalized the Committee's jurisdiction to include general interstate and foreign commerce issues.

During this time interstate and foreign commerce related to interstate oil compacts, energy resources on public lands, securities and exchanges, interstate power transmission, public health and quarantine, some regulation of interstate and foreign transportation, railroad labor, inland waterways, civil aeronautics, the Weather Bureau, the Bureau of Standards and weights and measure standards. Jurisdiction over the Bureau of Standards, weights and measures, and the metric system were transferred from the Committee on Energy and Commerce to the newly created Committee on Science and Astronautics (today's Committee on Science and Technology).

In 1974 the Committee Reform Amendments gave the Committee many of the jurisdictional responsibilities it has today: consumer affairs and protection, health care and facilities, and biomedical research.

Further reforms made during the 96th Congress gave the Committee jurisdiction over energy policy and oversight over the Department of Energy and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission which currently dominates the agenda. Minor changes in the 104th and 107th Congresses refined the scope of the Committee's jurisdiction over energy issues and granted jurisdiction over securities and exchanges to the Committee on Financial Services.

Over the 200

plus years of its existence the Committee on Energy and Commerce has handled several pieces of landmark legislation including the Public Health Service Act, the Social Security Act, the Energy Policy and Conservation Act, the NAFTA Implementation Act, the Energy Policy Act, and the Safe Drinking Water Act.
